ILL FATE OF DONNER PARTY'S TRAGIC TALE AN EPIC OF NEVADA

Annals of Historic Pathfinders Who Preceded Utah Pioneers
Recalled by the Sixty-second Anniversary of Their Arrival at Reno.

Even before the Utah pioneers came, there passed through this region a company of sturdy men and women—at least, they were sturdy when they began their journey westward—known as the Donner party. The ill-starred history of this party is written in words each one of which spells tragedy.

A record of bitter suffering, indescribable hardship, starvation and death is that of the Donner party. They left the east hopeful, strong, confident; they came to their destination—those of them that came there at all—broken, wretched, some praying for the death to relieve them that did not come.

Those who have read the intensely interesting novel of the Sierras, "Gabriel Conroy," will recall the thrilling tales therein recounted. Well, "Gabriel Conroy" is about the Donner party. Lake Donner is in Nevada county, California, and lies at an altitude of 6,095 feet.

The Nevada State Journal published an article in it last Wednesday, which contains more information about the trials of the Donner party than any letters or interviews yet reproduced. The article in the State Journal reads: "Exactly sixty-two years ago today, the year before gold was first discovered in California, the famous and ill-fated Donner party arrived in Reno in the midst of a fearful snowstorm."

The events preceding the arrival of the party in Reno, its thrilling, and agonizing days of prolonged suffering, in the midst of self-sacrifice, the unprecedented snowstorm as it reached this city and the tragic events which followed, is best told by Thomas Wren, who wrote of them from data he personally secured from some of the relatives of the party itself. He says:

Start From Springfield.
"In April of 1846, commenced, with the starting of an emigrant party from Springfield, Ill., the darkest tragedy of the western trail, the soul-harrowing fate of strong men, devoted women and helpless little children. It was the Donner party, headed by George and Jacob, brothers of that name, and their families, numbering sixteen. In the party at the start were also James F. Reed and his family of seven and Franklin W. Graves with a family of twelve. Patrick Breen and family of nine joined them at Independence, Mo., and beyond Fort Bridger a widow, Mrs. Lavine Murphy, and her family were added. Altogether in the party were ninety persons, the trail being increased finally to nearly 300 wagons."

"At Fort Bridger the first step on the road to death was taken when the Donner brothers, with a portion of the other emigrants, left the others to try the new route to California via Salt Lake and the Hastings Cutoff. The conservative ones who stayed with the old route reached their goal in safety, while the others were destined to misfortune after misfortune and to the endurance of almost incredible suffering, to which more than half succumbed. Instead of seven it was thirty days before they reached Salt Lake, crossing the great desert with ever sinking hearts. When the western margin was reached it was apparent that some one must go forward to Sutter's Fort, 700 miles' journey, and come back with provisions. William McCutcheon, of Missouri and C. T. Stanton of Chicago, Ill., volunteered, and left on horseback."

"On October 9 Harcoop and Keeseeberg fell behind, the latter coming up at night, the former dying. Indians ran off twenty-eight of their cattle at Humboldt Sink, and, actually starving, the party wandered on, only the children riding. After leaving the Humboldt Sink, Keeseeberg, with a rich man, Wolfinger, fell behind, Keeseeberg coming on alone. When dying later Joseph Reinhart confessed to having a hand in the murder of Wolfinger. Relief in the person of C. T. Stanton met them near where Wadsworth now stands. Stanton had not only provisions, but mules, with two Indian vaqueros to aid in transporting them, all furnished by the generosity of Captain Sutter, who refused all compensation."

Mistake Has Dire Results.
"When the party reached Reno they made another mistake, one fraught with dire results, in deciding to rest three or four days. A fearful storm was gathering in the mountains and eagerly as the emigrants urged their party forward, the elements outstripped them, and three miles below Truckee, at Fraser Creek, on Oct. 23, 1846, four weeks earlier than it usually came, the snow commenced falling, six inches at that point, but on the summit in some places five feet in depth. Many and desperate were the futile attempts to cross that awful barricade of snow from their camp hastily made at Donner lake, out all in vain; the pitiless snow descended, bringing in its wake agony and death."

"It was impossible to move in any direction, so all perforce, made what arrangements they could to try to weather the storm. All live stock was buried in the huge drifts, and from their carcasses the meat already frozen, was prepared for food. Little as they ate, grim starvation was soon beside them, and on the 18th of December, 1846, a party of seventeen started out to bring relief, if possible.
"Five they went far two had to return to camp, but the fifteen pressed on, among them Mrs. Sarah Fiedler, her sister Mary Graves, C. T. Stanton and F. W. Graves. One by one, death, stalking by their side, reached first one then another, until only seven were left. What pen could describe the revulsion of feeling when suddenly they came upon footprints in the snow, and following these made when a hope came to an Indian rancher. Stolid as is the Indian the condition of the seven emaciated, starving persons impressed them deeply, and they gave every assistance they could. Taking up the march with Indian guides, on they pressed until they gradually gave out, and Mr. Eddy, leaving one man and five women, reached Johnson's ranch on Bear river, then the only ranch or Sierra's western slope. A relief party went back fifteen miles and brought in the six who had fallen by the way."

Arrival of Rescuers.
"A month had passed since the party left Donner lake, and over half their number had literally laid down their lives for their friends, not knowing whether the sacrifices would be rewarded or not. Help from Sutter was secured by John Rhodes in a week, and six men under Captain Reason P. Tucker provided with provisions and mules, left for Donner lake in less than two weeks."

"At Donner lake the slow tragedy of life, sustained in a few, while the many perished, dragged on, until on the 18th of February, 1847, the rescuers arrived. Every moment was precious and the return was soon commenced by twenty-three survivors of that fearful siege with their rescuers, and of those two had to return and three soon died. Their trials were not over for soon provisions were all gone, and just as they had given up hope a second rescuing party appeared, headed by John P. Reed, on the 25th of February, 1847. Reed had preceded the Donner party several months, and the joy of his reunion with his family was soon out short, for Reed pressed on to Donner lake, where his two little daughters were, having been carried back by the preceding party."

Sufferings at Starved Camp.
"When Reed's party reached their provisions had given out and the party of seventeen commenced the journey onward. They had not gone far when a terrible storm broke and camp was made; that camp was known to history as 'Starved Camp,' and Mr. Reed, with his two little ones and a companion, went on ahead to secure aid if possible. Cady and Stone soon caught up with the four and on the third night all reached Woodworth's camp at Bear Valley. One can only imagine the sufferings of the ones left at Starved Camp. A third relief party, John Stark, Howard Oakley and Charles Stone, were near, and W. H. Eddy (saved by a former party and W. H. Foster), were coming on the same errand of mercy. They, with the addition of Hiram Miller, left Woodworth's camp the next day after Reed arrived, but when they reached Starvation Camp only two of the seven could stand upright. John Stark urged and entreated until a portion started out, the others remaining for another relief party to find them."

"While the third relief party saved four of the five survivors, a fourth party was required to save Lewis Keeseeberg, which it did Aug. 7, 1847. Of the members of the Donner party, six failed even to reach the mountains, forty-two died horrible deaths one by one, leaving only forty-eight survivors."
